

NOVA HISTORIA

A Viable Solution

The task of fully implementing diversity in history education is daunting, especially since the idea of nationhood and to an extent, our view of ethnicity today has changed much from the past. But the most important thing for students learning history today is asking the question of how everyone can learn from the historical subject and how it directly impacts their lives, and how minority groups have historically interacted and shared their history and culture with the dominant one.

So it's never too late, advocate for this change, and let history become part of everyone's daily life and a source of rich cultural stories!

Bracey, P. (2006). Teaching for diversity? Exploring an Irish dimension in the school history curriculum since 1970. History of Education, 35(6), 619-635. <https://doi.org/10.1080/00467600600966330>

Bracey, P. (2015). 'Shaping the Future', Black history and diversity: TEACHER perceptions and implications for curriculum development. Education 3-13, 44(1), 101-112. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03004279.2015.1095216>

Eybers, O. O. (2019). Applying Ayittey's Indigenous African institutions to generate EPISTEMIC plurality in the curriculum. Transformation in Higher Education, 4. <https://doi.org/10.4102/the.v4i0.68>

Hoodless, P. (n.d.). Equality, inclusion and diversity as part of the history curriculum. Teaching History in Primary Schools, 133-144. <https://doi.org/10.4135/9781446278574.n12>

Hutchins, R. (2016). Nationalism and history education. <https://doi.org/10.4324/9781315754857>

López, L. (L. (2017). The making Of Indigeneity, Curriculum history, and the limits of diversity. <https://doi.org/10.4324/9781315392424>